In loving memory of Mrs. Becky Reynolds Almond who died November 13, 1978.
Time goes quickly by,
Yet still it is so hard to conceive,
That all we have are memories so painfully received;
Four years has passed us by,
But in truth and love we do believe,
Because God has given us memories so thankfully received.

Use your auto as a defense against oil imports

The family car is the first line of defense in the battle against oil imports.

About one-third of all the petroleum used in the country is burned as gasoline in passenger cars. Nearly half of it is imported oil, at a cost to the nation of $50 billion a year.

Some of the ways to drive smarter are obvious, such as driving 55 miles an hour. Most cars use 20 percent less fuel at 55 than at 70. That's like saving 25 cents a gallon at the pump.

Other gas saving ideas may surprise some drivers. For example, every two pounds of pressure added to non-radial tires will increase gas mileage about one percent. Also, taking 100 pounds of excess weight out of a car or pickup truck add as much as four-tenths of a mile to each gallon of gasoline.

The average full sized car in the United States still gets about 15 actual miles to the gallon, in spite of window sticker claims of higher mileage, based on a mix of city and highway driving. The average family car will travel 11,000 miles a year.

This means it uses 750 gallons of gasoline a year at a cost of nearly $1,000 a year, based on an average pump price of $1.25 for regular gasoline. The annual cost presents the smart driver with a good opportunity to save real money.

There are two good ways, both of them easy, to save money with a little planning and record keeping--cutting miles driven and improving fuel efficiency.

To reduce miles driven, calculate how many miles the family car traveled in the previous year and set a goal of cutting that mileage by 20 percent. If accurate miles per year can't be calculated, use the national average of 11,000 miles a year and work on driving 20 percent less than that, on a monthly basis.

Although 20 percent seems like a large figure, it's easy to hit with some planning. Postpone those errands that aren't absolutely necessary until several stops can be made on a single trip around town. Then plan the route so there is as little backtracking as possible.

Substitute the telephone, riding a bicycle, or walking for trips that might have been made in the family car. It's surprising how often this works.

To improve fuel efficiency, set a goal for the family car. A 10 percent improvement should be possible over the first three months, then another five percent in the next three months. Since there won't be much more improvement possible beyond that point, make an effort to keep the family car operating at that more efficient level.

When calculating mileage, average miles per gallon over three tank fillups. This will average out the differences in how full the gas tank actually gets, and will also average out highs and lows in weekly or monthly driving.

Use the average of three tanks full of gasoline as the baseline, then try to improve actual car mileage by slowing down, both in town and on the highway, keeping tire pressure at the optimum level or a little higher, and doing minor engine tuneups at home such as replacing an air filter or installing new spark plugs.
